One of the most common complaints when taking photos from a DSLR are “subject splashing”, which is quite due to the rolling shutter effect. The new High ISO Noise Reduction feature in Photoshop does a great job with treating digital noise, but it is very expensive solution that beginners may have a harder time using. It is designed to darken noises and images in a certain area with the goal to minimize other noises. If Lightroom’s new Exif data import works as it should, Exif import may be one of the most impressive features in this version. It allows you to import both the basic and more advanced metadata from your camera and also your RAW converter. It is disabled by default, but you can specify whether you want to import it manually or automatically. As mentioned, the thing I am most impressed with in this new release is the new Batch utility, which is another time-saver. With the new Exporting feature in Lightroom 3.0, you can now share your work with the new Create Bookmark feature. Bookmarks provide a grouping for the photos so that all photos can be selected, sorted, or exported at once. It is a great way to share your work with colleagues, for example, without needing to export each image individually. The new batch feature that I am most excited about comes with the new Share for Review tool. It essentially provides commenting and collaborative workflow for group reviews. In addition to the comments, they also provide high resolution illustration from the original image, which is great. Note that the Illustrator drawing layer gets added as a new “layer group” at the beginning of each comment. Also, note that the Illustrator layer group updates automatically in real-time, but only in the comments. That means that you can see what illustrations are provided and keep up with the conversation, but it does not update your actual image.

In addition, with the help of the Adobe Creative Suite, new editing features are introduced like: Content-Aware Move, Paste as a Layer, removal of red eye, warp with affine, warp with canvas, alpha channel to vector conversion, paint with texture, and usage of multiple files. Parts of the Blur Gallery is a new feature introduced in Photoshop CC. It enables you to blur images and photo effects much easier. navigation. X-Finder, a drop-down panel that shows the current selection, provides an easy-to-use interface for selecting parts of an image. It is also used in the Content-Aware crop tool. The recently introduced camera raw (can be downloaded as a free extension) helps in improving white balance, exposure, and saturation. In addition, there is a new adjustment layer (Layer Mask) that helps you add and reduce effects to specific areas of a layer.

Adobe is busy repositioning Photoshop as a tool to be used, not to be kept. Given the product's poor track record with workflow and product support, they will need to definitely separate the product from the workflow and delivery models. We are working to provide a way to mirror your Photoshop models to create a true 3D simulation of the product.
