Learn how to connect to any Windows, Mac, Android, and more using your Remote Desktop connection. Download link: How to allow users to edit my entities? I have read this post : How can I use annotations to give permissions to users (like @create @delete...) to update my entities (for example, an Employee has a ManyToMany relationship with a Department) How can I give my users the right to update the entities? A: Spring Security offers standard beans like @PreAuthorize and @PostAuthorize that have been integrated with Spring Data JPA. For example: @PreAuthorize("hasRole('ROLE_ADMIN')") @Modifying @Query("select e from Employee e join fetch e.departments de") @Transactional public List getAllEmployees() { return entityManager.createQuery("SELECT e FROM Employee e JOIN FETCH e.departments de WHERE de.departmentId = :departmentId").setParameter("departmentId", 1).getResultList(); } would execute a query and if the user is authorized (a @PreAuthorize annotation is defined on a method) it will then allow the user to view the result of that query See also the Spring Security Reference Guide. If you also use JPA 2.0 and the new JPA 2.0 feature for joins you can specify the join fetch type: @Query("select e from Employee e join fetch e.departments de") I have yet to see what possible problem there might be by allowing Spring Security access to your repository methods. RDC Launcher is a tiny, user-friendly program that has the role of allowing the use of Remote Desktop client as a Remote Desktop Connection. The utility may come in handy for users who are experiencing some issues with RDC, such as re-connection problems over VPN, for instance. Therefore, the idea behind the tool is to enable users to reap the advantages of RD in a sleek and stylish GUI. The application solely works on Windows 10 and it requires the Remote Desktop client installed on the machine. Getting started is a simple and straightforward process that entails entering basic details such as the computer's name and port and the title preferred to be displayed in the new window. Only the Computer: Port is mandatory and the rest of the available options are discretionary. Before launching the session, users can also specify if they prefer the remote connection to be displayed in full screen, fit to window or update the resolution on resize. These settings can be changed at any time from the connection window as well. It is worth mentioning that the application supports multiple connections that can be selected from a drop down menu. Connections that are not in use can be deleted with a click of a button directly from the interface. Program Information v1.0.4.0
