Final Cut Pro X has always been a great video editing app, but now the new update takes that app to the next level. It can handle almost any storage system and take almost any file type. It's truly a one-app solution for editing video. While the improvements to the AI were great, there are two things that disappointed me about this release. The first is that they addressed the "lousy" text tools, but they're still a significant step behind. The previous version managed to get rid of the text tools entirely. A single click could now convert any text to a path, which has hurt the text capacity of the entire application. The second is that the update concerned itself more with the styling of children and pets than actual photos. Pretending to be a "1.1" release may be a way to make users forget that the new release is really 1.4, but it falls way short of Apple's completed transition. While the AI settles into the software, enhancing RAW support, the new release brings Adobe's graphics engine to the level of highest-end console game engines. Mesh and lens support are a few of the features in the pipeline, and Adobe clearly means business in regards to making heavy use of VR in the near future.
