Before importing, make sure that you have the latest version of the Adobe program installed, and ensure that you have reset your Lightroom catalog to a clean state. You might need to stop/start the program. I can easily see myself using what I'd call the "new features" of this latest set of Photoshop updates. But that is precisely where all the fans of the previous version tend to stop. It is the tools that have been around for years that are the most useful, the tools that permit some Photoshop users to take decades of experience and immediately "get" the power that those user interfaces contain. It's not that those tools aren't important; it's that they have remained essentially unchanged for years. In this release, the tools have evolved. I'm a big fan of smartphones and tablets. With so many people owning them today, we need to get the best experiences from them while they are out and about with us. APB, by Adobe, is a major application that can work on both iOS and Android and it can be used to get critical documentary work done on the road. It's also a good benchmark for examining a product from the other side of the fence. I've been using it for a few months and I don't consider myself an expert, yet. However, I do feel comfortable in recommending it as a tool for the demands of documentary photographers. This is what I like about the most about Photoshop. No matter what, it keeps evolving. As a tool for photographers, Adobe Photoshop is unique in that it allows you to work on a huge range of raw image formats: TIFF, JPEG, GIF, among others. They were all extremely accessible and fast to use when I first started using it after having picked it up on an iPad compared to a normal monitor. In this release, RAW support has been added. Even though I'm familiar with RAW, it can take some time to get used to—it's not exactly intuitive. Fortunately, Adobe has come to the rescue here. They've introduced a more intuitive and attractive interface. Since RAW files are considerably larger, certain tools have also been updated to be more efficient.
